From small colleges to the largest universities, Business Education is moving to make learning more real. For both undergraduate and MBA Business students the culminating learning experience is more frequently an actual project for a living, breathing organization. Doing by Learning is a roadmap of what Business students need to know and do when faced with a field-based business capstone project. It nicely bridges the gap between students' success in Business courses and integrating their knowledge through an applied business research project. It does this by, first, helping students understand the WHY of the journey they are undertaking by reflecting on their Business education. Next, groundwork is provided on HOW experiential and work-based learning processes will now be paramount to learning from experience in a real project. Finally, the WHAT is presented through very specific methods to successfully design, research and implement a large and often loosely defined project. This book takes a very student-oriented and "hands-on" approach that captures how learning really happens in today's organizations. There is a strong emphasis, for example, on students engaging in their own primary research, since so much of work-based learning and decision making happens through social interaction and direct inquiry rather than large population, statistically-driven studies. It does this through the use of the more current, interactive and iterative tools of learning in today's workplace such as Design Thinking, Action Research, Experiential Learning, Action Learning, Appreciative Inquiry and others. Doing by Learning also includes thirty-five experiential activities designed to make the learning more engaging and fun. While these activities are designed to be self-paced by the reader, they also make perfect assignments in a course or seminar wrapped around the student project itself. Four case studies, inspired by real student projects, are also presented throughout the text to provide living examples of the process. The steps and tools in Doing by Learning match today's fast paced academic environment. Originally designed to accommodate eight week-long online capstone courses, this book is perfect for Business capstone courses that are increasingly offered over shorter timelines and in hybrid, remote or online modes. Fifteen years ago Trudy Banta and her colleagues surveyed thenational landscape for the campus examples that were published inthe classic work Assessment in Practice. Since then, significantadvances have occurred, including the use of technology to organizeand manage the assessment process and increased reliance onassessment findings to make key decisions aimed at enhancingstudent learning. Trudy Banta, Elizabeth Jones, and Karen Blackoffer 49 detailed current examples of good practice in planning,implementing, and sustaining assessment that are practical andready to apply in new settings. This important resource can helpeducators put in place an effective process for determining whatworks and which improvements will have the most impact in improvingcurriculum, methods of instruction, and student services on collegeand university campuses. "Institutional researchers, accreditation committee members,faculty, and all the rest of us working to assess student learningwill be inspired by the examples of good practices set in ascholarly context by Banta, Jones, and Black." —Randy L.Swing, executive director, Association for InstitutionalResearch "The authors' long and deep experience in assessment hasinformed this wonderful resource, which combines overarchingprinciples of effective assessment with concrete case studies drawnfrom diverse institutions. Readers will learn how to go beyondusing standardized test scores as the sole measure of learning, howto establish classroom-based assessment, how to use multipleassessment data for improvement, and how to get faculty involved inthe process." —Barbara E. Walvoord, author, Effective Gradingand Assessment Clear and Simple "Higher education's preeminent assessment scholars have done itagain, responding to growing requests for assessment models andexamples of good practice with an extensive array of meaningful,practical profiles. No matter what your institution's mission, andno matter where you are in the assessment process, you will find awealth of ideas here." —Linda Suskie, author, AssessingStudent Learning: A Common Sense Guide

The premise of this book is that managers should act not only as decision makers, but also as designers. In a series of essays from a multitude of disciplines, the authors develop a theory of the design attitude in contrast to the more traditionally accepted and practiced decision attitude.
